Excerpt: . . . At the scale of 1-to 10-km stream segments, several Finally, field sampling at various scales provides cor-field removal experiments in which all age classes of relative evidence of the effects of nonnative trout inva-the native and invaded populations were measured pro-sions. For example, brook trout appear to have displaced vide strong evidence of invader impacts. Peterson and cutthroat trout in a Nevada watershed (Dunham and oth-others (2004) found that abundance of native Colorado ers 1999), and bull trout in an Idaho watershed (Rieman River cutthroat trout fry and juveniles increased after and others 2006), where the native and nonnative species four years of brook trout removal in a Colorado stream, co-occurred. However, the effects were highly variable compared to a control stream, because survival of age-0 among streams. Rich and others (2003) showed that bull cutthroat trout increased 13 fold and that of age-1 fish trout occurrence in small low-gradient streams below doubled after brook trout removal. In contrast, no such barriers in a Montana watershed was strongly associated increase occurred in another pair of streams at higher with complex habitat structure and strong neighboring elevation, because cutthroat trout recruitment often populations that could provide demographic support, but failed, apparently due to cold temperatures (Coleman was negatively associated with presence of brook trout and Fausch 2006). Surprisingly, survival of adult cut-(Figure 3). Townsend and Crowl (1991) and McIntosh throat trout was unaffected by brook...
